Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum's Mission

The Museum aspires to be a "doorway to art," open to all people for compelling art experiences—a place where children can visit, budding artists can debut their works, and people with disabilities can come to enjoy art without hesitation. The Museum will strive to build an "art community: a place for creativity and coaction" where people can encounter new values, re-examine themselves, and deepen their bonds with the world. In this context, then, it will provide encounters with art as "nourishment for living." The Museum will seek through its activities to be "a haven for enrichment of the heart."

History of the Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum

SATO Keitaro(1868-1940)

An industrialist born in Kitakyushu City and once considered the "King of Coal." Inspired by the philanthropy of American steel magnate Andrew Carnegie, SATO used his own funds to found the Tokyo Prefectural Art Museum, subsidize scholarships and hospitals, and promote research for education and the betterment of living.

1926 ▶ Founding — Tokyo Prefectural Art Museum*

The Museum opened on May 1, 1926 as Japan's first public art museum on the basis of a one million yen donation(about 4 billion yen in today's currency) by industrialist SATO Keitaro. Besides exhibitions showcasing works by art groups, it hosted touring exhibitions of significant artists and exhibitions of art masterpieces from Japan and abroad. In this way, it functioned as a "temple of art" transmitting art broadly to the public.

*Renamed Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum in 1943 when Tokyo Metropolis was formed.

1975 ▶ The Museum Reopens in a New Building

The original museum building having aged and grown cramped for space, a new building designed by MAYEKAWA Kunio was constructed. The newly reborn "Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum" began holding curated exhibitions and collecting artworks as a full-scale art museum. It also conducted education outreach activities—the precursor of today's workshops—offered an art library open to the public, and otherwise undertook services that made it a forerunner of today's public art museum. In 1995, the Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum relocated some 3,000 of its collected works and 50,000 art reference materials to the newly opened "Museum of Contemporary Art Tokyo."

2012 ▶ Renovation and Grand Reopening

A major renovation of the museum building was undertaken to introduce universal design and expand its restaurants and museum shop while respecting MAYEKAWA's widely popular design. On April 1, 2012, the Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum made a fresh beginning with new thematic exhibitions and art communication Programs, based on a policy designed to enhance its vitality and appeal as an art museum.

January 8 (Wed), 2025

From the Tokyo Metropolitan Government's extensive collection, paintings that capture nostalgic hometowns and scenes from the past, as well as photographs that evoke suburban life in contemporary cities. "Nostalgia" differs in meaning not only from person to person but also from era to era, generation to generation, and region to region. What kind of emotion is it?

Joan Miró

March 1 (Sat), 2025 – July 6 (Sun), 2025

An exhibition surveying the entire painting career of Joan Miró (1893–1938), the great 20th-century Spanish master, through representative works from each period of his life. This major retrospective will enable visitors to experience the essence of Miró's art through works whose appeal spans cultures and generations.

ART COMMUNICATION PROGRAMS

The Museum undertakes programs to foster communication among people through art.
The programs are designed to take viewers beyond simple viewing to a deeper "experience" of the artworks.

Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum &
Tokyo University of the Arts
Tobira Project

Tobira Project is a "social design project" undertaken cooperatively by the Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum, Tokyo University of the Arts, and art communicators "Tobira" recruited from the general public. By connecting people with art, with spaces, and with other people in the art museum context, the Project is working to design a community uniting people of different values and backgrounds.

©Yusuke Nakajima

国立科学博物館 ©Ryo Fujishima

A program linking all 9 cultural facilities in Ueno Park to support children in their "museum debut." The program is a "learning design project" providing a flat learning environment where adults and children learn on an equal basis. Programs for the participation of elementary, junior high, and high school students are held throughout the year.

Creative Ageing
ずっとひ

The Tokyo Metropolitan Art Museum envisages being a museum that people can enjoy throughout their entire lives. With this concept in mind, we have launched "Creative Ageing Zuttobi" project serving the needs of super-aged society in Japan. We provide older adults with participatory programs for creative encounters with artworks.

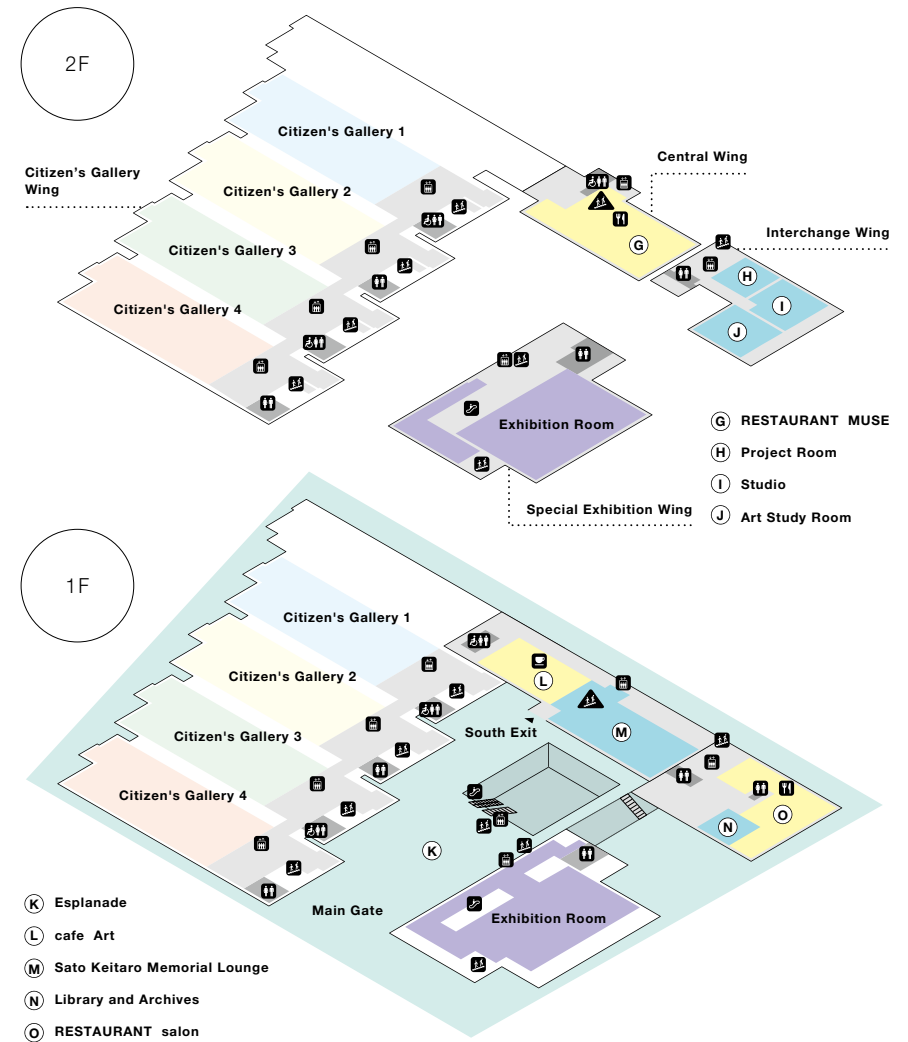

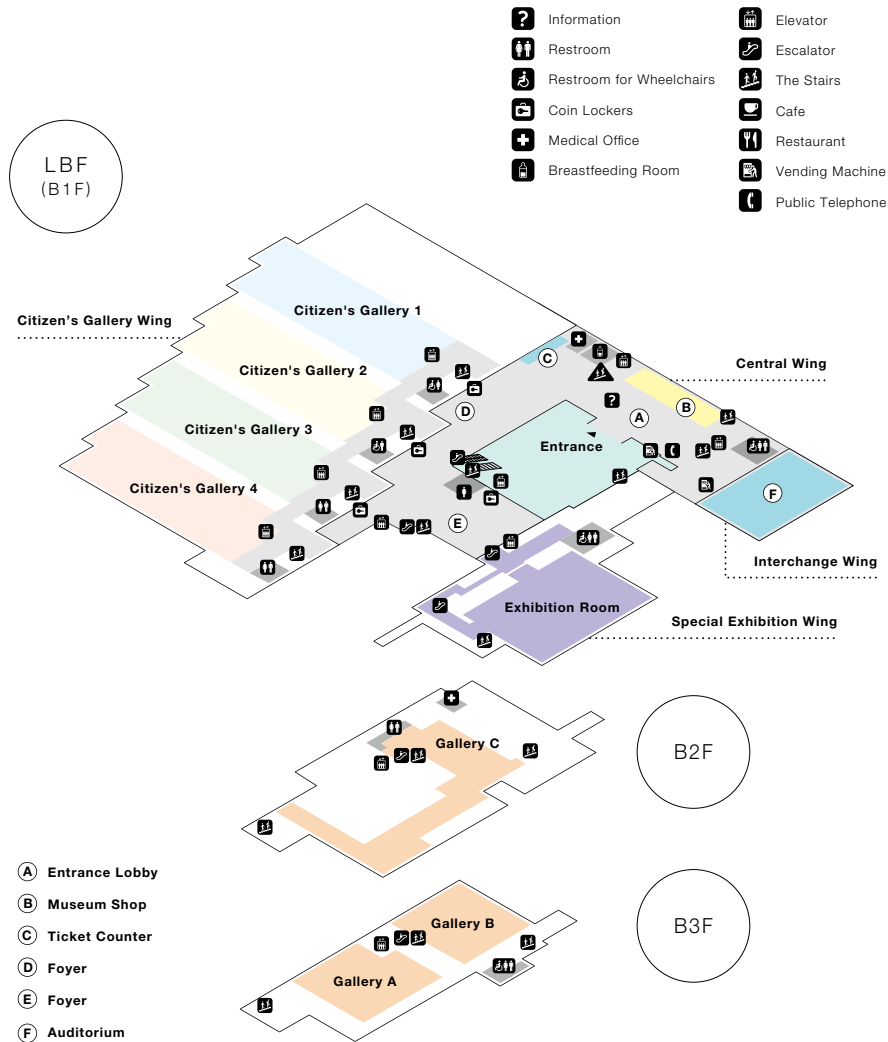

To increase awareness of the Art Communication Programs it launched in 2012, the Museum holds a "Welcome to Art Communication Programs" event each summer where visitors can experience the programs, learn their history, and know what actually goes on in them. Held in Citizen's Gallery 3 on the lobby floor, the event takes the form of an exhibition where visitors can enjoy communicating through artworks and experiencing participatory programs. Art communicators(Tobira), including Tobira who have completed their term of involvement, are always on hand in the gallery.
